

The Last Day

The fact that we comprehend our own mortality probably sets us apart from every other species on earth and perhaps even the universe. The fact that we don't know when, that we don't know how many years, or even how many days we have left to live leaves us with a sense of wonder and uncertainty throughout our lives. If you somehow learned that today was your last day how would you treat those around you? Would you make sure that you told the people most important to you that you loved them? Or be certain to thank those who changed your life for the better?

Would you spend time with your spouse, your children or your parents? What would you do if you had the knowledge that your time had run out? What would you try to accomplish today for those who had helped you along the way? This is Bob Brenna Jr, from the law firm of Brenna and Brenna urging you to not to wait. To make today a day you live by the standard you would set for yourself, if it were your last. To live it to the fullest, because we only have so many...and we really can't afford to waste even one.

From the law firm of Brenna and Brenna, 31 East Main Street, Suite 2000 Liberty Plaza, Rochester, New York 14614.